Summary

Young and aspiring software developer. Constantly learning new things and keeping up with the world of AI. Passionate about AI Agents. Constantly building projects, each one more complicated than the one before. Turning ideas into software I build via patterns and pre-built frameworks made by mistakes. Always ready to dive deep and learn new things.

Binary Flow is a marketing agency that worked with 2-10 clients at the time I was employed.

Under the supervision of the owner I developed a proper dashboard according to their needs.

It was scaled to handle tons of KPI data flooding in and it connects to multiple Marketing tools to fetch data.

At a certain point the flow was automated with Zapier but the owner of the agency got in contact with the marketing tool owners and made the integrations via a custom API.

The project was started building in Databutton first but we migrated to Loveable later on.

The project was deployed and used by the agency while new features were actively being pushed.

As the project migrated to Loveable, we switched from Firebase to Supabase. We finished the first final version in October and the owner decided that he had a good enough product and would add features on his own if he needed them and would contact me if necessary.

Whilst working I was constantly taking feature requests from the marketing team and transforming them into an end product.
